Set your college-bound student up for success while preserving your sanity!
You and your child have invested a lot of time, money and energy in order for them to attend college this fall. Once your child leaves home, you worry if they are really prepared for the transition. Fortunately, you have several months to teach them some critical life skills that will prepare them more thoroughly. By the time August rolls around they will be more self-reliant, more studious individuals with improved time management skills, and better equipped to handle the potential hurdles of college life. Keep it together during a stressful time in your family's lives: Preparation+Organization=Success!

In this comprehensive workshop Organizational Consultant Kristin Borostyan, a former school counselor of 13 years, will share her insights and expertise on:

- Encouraging independence while building skills and confidence.
- Creating Great Parenting Moments (GPM) and building an adult/child relationship
- Tips to help your child with organization, time management lessons and creating accountability
- Deciphering what products will help them stay organized and how to plan ahead
- What colleges are saying about incoming freshman and how to support them
- Why this generation of students is different from previous ones and what that means for them and for you
- How to discuss important matters like finances, grades and conduct at school
- How to enjoy the preparation time and create valuable memories before they leave
- How to prepare yourself and your family for the absence of your college student
- How to interact with your child when they come home for vacation after a successful 1st semester at college

This workshop will be interactive and parent participation will be encouraged. Leave confident knowing your child will have the tools and support necessary to be successful their first semester in college making it a smoother, less stressful and more enjoyable process for everyone involved.
